Senate in 1851, he is credited with signaling the disaffection with the Compromise of 1850 and placing the anti-slavery crusade on a political footing. The brutal assault made upon him in Congress, resulting from his insulting phillippics, was one more pivotal event, like John Brown's raids, which emotionally polarized the nation and intensified the inevitability of civil conflict,

Summer had a large part in the formation of the Republican Party and his published and distributed oration "The Barbarism of Slavery" was a prominent propaganda piece in the campaign of 1860. When the Civil War began he was the first prominent statesman to urge emancipation as a measure to end the war. When the Proclamation was finally issued, no man had done more than him to prepare public sentiment for its approval. With Republican control of the Senate in 1861, Sumner was made chairman of the powerful foreign relations committee rendering a decade of distinguished service in that post. Forging a close alliance with the administration he successfully suppressed moves in Congress which risked war with Great Britain and France.

Sumner was the earliest progenitor of the extreme doctrine that secession disposed of all rights of the separatist States. A radical Republican, he championed Congressional reconstruction of the South in opposition to the moderate Presidential prescription and probably was the greatest influence in the defeat of Lincoln's proposal. In the Johnson administration he joined with Thaddeus Stevens in the leadership of radical reconstruction intent on securing civil rights for freedmen. He was prominent in the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson, his indiscriminate invective earning him justified historical criticism.

Biography

Charles Sumner, United States Senator and ardent abolitionist was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1811. His father, Charles Pinckney Sumner, was outspoken in condemning slavery and so earnest an advocate of "equal rights" that he opposed the exclusion of black children from the schools and the law prohibiting interracial marriage.

Unable to secure an appointment to West Point, Sumner entered Harvard College and later Harvard Law School where he became the devoted pupil and friend of Joseph Story. Before beginning his practice, Sumner spent several weeks in Washington attending the Supreme Court, where his friend, Story, was a Justice. Sumner listened to Webster and Clay but, left Washington with a distaste for politics. The routine of law practice bored him so, he went to Europe for nearly three years, where he met many great leaders and learned French, German and Italian.

In 1851, Sumner was elected to the Senate and the aggressive abolitionist vigorously attacked the Fugitive-slave Law. In 1856, during his notable anti-slavery speech, "In Crime against Kansas," he denounced the Kansas-Nebraska Act as "a swindle." A master of the invective, Sumner singled out Senator Butler of South Carolina as one of his special victims. days later Butler's mephew, Representative Preston Brooks, attacked Sumner with a cane and severely injured him. It took nearly 3-1/2 years for his recovery but, the Massachusetts legislature re-elected him by an almost unanimous vote.

When Summer returned to the Senate, he found that southern leaders were more aggressive than ever over slavery in the territories. During the debate for the admission of Kansas as a free state, he attempted to assault slavery on all fronts-social, moral and economic as well as the political aspects. He ignored his Massachusetts constituents and refused to support the Crittenden Compromise. Sumner continually urged emancipation to end the war and highly approved of Lincoln's Proclamation, though he had been impatient at its long delay.

He played an important part in organizing the Republican Party and when they controlled the Senate in 1861, he was made chairman of the "committee on foreign affairs -- an assignment worthy of his abilities. In the "Trent Affair he favored releasing the Confederate commissioners, Mason and Slidell. He kept the United States at peace with Britain and France, when war with either of them would have disrupted the Union.

8. Significance: (2) Charles Sumner House, Boston, Massachusetts

Summer believed the seceded states had "committed suicide" and therefore lost all rights under the Constitution. Along with Thaddeus Stevens, he held that reconstruction was the function of Congress--not the President. He actively sought President Johnson's impeachment. He hampered negotiations concerning Civil War claims against Britain and strongly denounced President Grant's scheme to annex Santo Domingo, which probably led to his removal from the chairmanship of the foreign affairs committee.

Despite Summer's devotion to the one cause of "absolute human equality," he was diligent in the routine work of a senator and was respected in his discussions of money and finance, the tariff, postal regulations and copyright. He died of a heart attack March 11, 1874.
